

Publications Policy
National Association for Interpretation
1998

The National Association for Interpretation is a private, non-profit membership organization. As such, it reserves the right to reject publication of articles, letters and electronic submissions that do not serve the interests of members or the mission of the association. Specific reasons that articles, letters and electronic files may not be published include but are not limited to:

- Submissions not relevant to the profession of interpretation or the stated mission of the association.
- Submissions not benefiting substantial numbers of members or the specific members in the specific markets receiving a newsletter, website, magazine or journal.
- Submissions containing statements of belief or judgments about others that are known or suspected to be untrue, whether members or not members of the association.
- Submissions that are libelous: “Words, pictures or cartoons that expose a person to public hatred, shame, disgrace or ridicule, or induce an ill opinion of a person . . .” (as stated in The Associated Press Stylebook and Libel Manual, p.282).”
- Submissions that include personal criticism of individuals or groups of individuals on bases unrelated to the interpretive profession or management, study and design of interpretive programs and facilities.
- Submissions of a religious, lifestyle, or political bias that do not directly contribute to dialogues about the interpretive profession or management, study, and design of interpretive programs and facilities.
- Submissions that report as fact, statements of opinion, belief, or bias.
- Submissions that encourage or praise unlawful behavior as a matter of professional or personal practice.
- Submissions may be published about public officials that would normally be considered libelous if they address important issues related to the profession of interpretation. Libel law includes exceptions or “privilege” which does allow the criticism of persons in public life or political positions.
